AN EXHIBITION OF
MODERN CERAMICS
FROM ABROAD

SUMMER 1959

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

The Royal Ontario Museum is most grateful to the collectors, many of them members of the Canadian Guild of Potters, who have generously lent their pieces. Without their help this exhibition would not have been possible.

POTTERY

The raw material of the potter's art is clay, which first takes form in his hands as it is thrown on the wheel. It is then fired or baked at high temperatures to give it permanent form. Clays vary in their properties and in their resistance to heat, and these variations result in the three main divisions of pottery. The first is earthenware, which is fired from 750° - 1150° C. It may be coarse or fine, but is relatively soft and porous. Stoneware, the second division, is subjected to higher temperatures (1200° - 1350° C.), and the product is no longer earthy. At these levels the clay is vitrified to produce a non-porous, stone-like body. Stoneware shades off into the third division, porcelain, which is fired at temperatures of 1300° - 1450° C. It is characterized by a white body, and in its finer forms is translucent. Pottery is madeto be handled, and through its combination of form and decoration, and its appeal to the sense of touch, is one of the most difficult and exacting arts.

The beginnings of modern pottery are found in the work of a small group of men working in France in the nineteenth century, who received a powerful stimulus from the ceramic masterpieces of the Far East. In the present century the major developments have taken place in England, Scandinavia and the United States. The great potters of our time have rediscovered the vitality of forms thrown on the wheel, and the work they produce is both for use and for the collector. In all arts, the collector fulfills an important duty: he keeps alive a love of beauty, and encourages and supports the creative artist.

Most of the objects in the exhibition were made during the last ten years. Approximate dates are shown for the few pieces produced before 1949.

POTTERS

The work of two Englishmen, Bernard Leach and W. Staite Murray, has been of the greatest importance in the development of modern pottery. Murray, a sensitive artist of great originality, trained in England. His period of active production commenced in 1920 and lasted until 1940, when he moved to Southern Rhodesia, where he now lives. Leach studied in Japan, where he absorbed the influence of Far Eastern ceramics and integrated this with the English tradition to produce work of great strength and character. About 1920 he established a pottery at St. Ives in Cornwall, where he still works, and where he continues to produce work of high artistic merit. He has with him a team of younger potters who make a range of inexpensive wares for everyday use. Both men taught many younger artists, and their influence has been widespread.

Two other potters working in England deserve special mention. Lucie Rie studied in Vienna and came to London in 1938. Subtlety and restraint combined with superb artistry distinguish her work: a contrast to the powerful originality of Hans Coper, who has worked with her since 1947.

A strong school of creative pottery flourishes in the Scandinavian countries. Some of the artists work individually, while others are employed by industrial concerns such as Waertsila (Arabia) in Finland, Gustavsberg in Sweden, and the Royal Copenhagen Factory in Copenhagen. One of the leading Danish factories, Saxbo, is operated by three artists of which one, Nathalie Krebs, studied under W. Staite Murray. Some Scandinavian potters draw their strength from the past, while others, particularly in Finland, show a keen interest in new forms and effects.

The same dual approach exists in the United States, but with greater emphasis on new horizons of form and texture. Much experimental work is done, but the strength of American pottery lies in the hard core of teaching artists such as Maija Grotell at The Cranbrook Academy of Arts, Daniel Rhodes at Alfred University, Edwin and Mary Scheier at the University of New Hampshire, and Franz Wildenhain at The School for American Craftsmen.
